CHILE: An Introduction to Bankruptcy/Restructuring

Contributed by Nelson Contador & Compañía Abogados

Reliance on Bankruptcy Proceedings

Historically, a notable lack of confidence existed regarding companies in a state of insolvency, thereby creating formidable obstacles for them to extricate themselves from insolvency through the establishment of payment agreements designed to avert bankruptcy.

Law 20.720.

To confront this issue, a solution was implemented through the enactment of Law 20.720. This legislation established a structured and improved mechanism allowing insolvent companies to propose a comprehensive payment plan within a judicial process known as the Reorganization Insolvency Proceeding. The primary objective was to enable these companies to sustain their business operations while ensuring full repayment of debts to creditors. However, the success of this mechanism hinges on a crucial prerequisite: the establishment of a foundation of trust among the involved parties.

Bankruptcy Reorganisation Proceedings

Following the implementation of the Insolvency and Bankruptcy Law (20.720.), a notable number of 308 companies have engaged in bankruptcy reorganisation proceedings, with a commendable success rate of 64% for approved restructurings. These proceedings have facilitated the streamlined reorganisation of a substantial sum of USD4,859 million in restructurable liabilities. This outcome unquestionably attests to the market's expressed confidence in reorganisation proceedings as a potent instrument for surmounting business challenges and stimulating economic advancement.

It is imperative to acknowledge the profound influence of this trend on the nation's public and economic policies, which are primarily directed towards fostering a culture of proactive debt prevention, safeguarding the rights of both creditors and debtors, and emphasising the imperative of business continuity.

In light of this, it is noteworthy to emphasise the significance of distinguished enterprises characterised by their extensive tenure in the country and a substantial workforce. These companies have chosen to undergo reorganisation bankruptcy proceedings and, commendably, have achieved successful adherence to such procedures. Exemplary cases, such as Enjoy and Multitiendas Corona, have effectively restructured billions of dollars in liabilities amidst the challenges posed by a global economic and health crisis. As a result of these triumphs, these enterprises have preserved their operational continuity, safeguarded employment opportunities, and currently operate at full capacity. Nevertheless, the prevailing obstacles encountered by our clientele manifest through multifaceted factors, stemming from either their financial strain or the nature of their market operations. Notably, agricultural enterprises have suffered significant repercussions due to the escalating import costs of inputs, primarily resulting from the ongoing Russia-Ukraine crisis. Similarly, construction companies have faced adversity owing to diminished real estate demand attributable to exorbitant mortgage loan rates.

Nevertheless, it is crucial to approach the current circumstances with a sense of optimism and pragmatism, as Law 20.720 provides mechanisms to address the insolvency predicaments faced by our clients. These mechanisms facilitate the restructuring of their liabilities, ensuring the continuity of their operations. However, accomplishing this requires a meticulous examination of the company, necessitating dedicated efforts to analyse its cash flows, contingencies, and relationships with suppliers and other creditors. Through this comprehensive assessment, we can offer an agreement that, in conjunction with the trust established with these stakeholders, presents a payment plan that instills peace of mind and security for both the indebted company and its creditors.

Impact of the Amendment to Law 20.720.

Aligned with the aforementioned, the amendment to Law 20.720. was enacted in August of this year, aimed at fostering the continuity of business operations for companies facing insolvency. This amendment extends the period of financial protection in bankruptcy from 30 to 60 days, affording ample time for both the debtor company and its creditors to resolve disputes and achieve mutually beneficial agreements. Moreover, the criteria for the debtor company to secure financing exceeding 20% of its recorded fixed assets are rendered more flexible. Additionally, the provision invoking the preference stipulated in Article 2472 N°4 of the Civil Code, wherein financiers recover their investments on preferential terms in the event of bankruptcy liquidation due to any cause, is eliminated.

Conclusion

In conclusion, it is evident that while a definitive solution to the challenges encountered by insolvent companies remains elusive, contemporary legislative efforts demonstrate a clear commitment to fostering the continuity of business operations for such entities. By introducing new benefits and tools, the legislator aims to enhance economic stability and provide assurance regarding credit repayment to creditors. From our perspective, these developments represent significant advancements in this domain, inspiring us to maintain confidence in Bankruptcy Reorganization Procedures and cultivate trust between debtor companies and creditors, all in accordance with the prevailing legal framework.

CHILE: An Introduction to Dispute Resolution: Arbitration

Contributed by Gutiérrez, Waugh, Jimeno & Asenjo

Drafting arbitration agreements: a practical approach

The parties to a given dispute may only resort to arbitration if they have agreed to do so in an arbitration agreement. Consequently, it is key that a proper arbitration agreement is in place, providing certainty that the dispute will actually be resolved by an arbitral tribunal, which will ultimately issue a binding award for the parties. However, in practice, this task can be harder than it may seem.

Problem Statement

The endeavor of drafting arbitration agreements is usually overlooked for various reasons. Sometimes, these agreements are drafted after protracted and depleting negotiations, when the parties and their advisors are exhausted and have “lowered their guard,” so to speak; other times, these clauses are discussed when the parties are thrilled with the perspective of the new business they are entering into, failing to see beyond its closing, neglecting the possibility that disputes could arise in the future. For this reason, these stipulations are customarily known as “mid-night clauses.”

This is how poorly drafted arbitration clauses –containing ambiguous, incoherent, or confusing terms– make their way to the final version of the contract. Let’s look at some examples.

- Sometimes the parties stipulate that any controversy “may” be submitted to arbitration. By using a facultative expression, the wording raises doubts as to whether the parties intended to deprive the State courts of their power to resolve their dispute, in order to submit the same to arbitration.
- A related doubt arises when an arbitration clause is inserted in a contract and, in a different clause, the parties submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the State courts of a given country.
- Another case occurs when the parties designate the institution which will administrate the arbitration in an obscure or confusing manner, such as “an arbitration conducted by the International Chamber of Commerce («ICC») of Geneva, Switzerland.” Of course, the ICC is located in Paris; and, simultaneously, a Chamber of Commerce exists in Geneva. Under such circumstances, it is unclear whether the parties’ intention was for the arbitration to be administered by the ICC, or by the Geneva Chamber of Commerce.
- Occasionally, impossible or extremely hard instructions for the conduction of the arbitration proceedings are included; v.gr., when the parties stipulate that the proceedings cannot last more than 30 days, which is simply unrealistic.

All of the above and other cases of defective arbitration agreements are commonly referred to as pathological clauses, an expression coined in 1974 by Frédéric Eisemann. The expression alludes to a set of stipulations whose common denominator is that –prima facie– reflects an intention to resort to arbitration, albeit manifested in inaccurate or equivocal terms. Hence, despite being valid stipulations (in the legal sense of the word), their practical effectiveness can be called into question, and it frequently is. The outcome is that the pathological clause prevents or hampers the proper and normal conduction of the arbitration.

The legal solution provided by State courts

While exercising their assistance powers –during the process of establishing an arbitral tribunal– and their power of control over the arbitration –when reviewing arbitral awards– State courts of various jurisdictions have issued judgments explaining the legal treatment for these pathological arbitration agreements.

Sophisticated venues tend to choose a highly benevolent interpretation regarding the enforceability of arbitration clauses. If the pathology can be cured by the laws of the arbitral seat, or by the judge’s interpretative efforts, the dispute will be referred to arbitration.

For instance, in Insignia Technology Co. Ltd. v. Alstom Technology, the Court of Appeal of Singapore found that a principle of arbitration law exists whereby the interpretation of an arbitration clause which renders the clause effective must be preferred: if the parties’ clear intent was to resolve their differences in arbitration, such intent must be enforced, regardless of defective, ambiguous, or incomplete wording. The same criterion was endorsed by the Higher Court of Singapore in HKL Group Co. Ltd. v. Rizq International Holdings Pte. Ltd.

Similarly, in Mangistaumunaigaz Oil Production Association v. United World Trade Inc., the English court ruled that the parties’ stipulation to submit their differences to “[a]rbitration, if any, by ICC Rules in London” did not prevent the arbitration from being held, since the expression “if any” was simply an unnecessary or irrelevant phrase which had to be disregarded.

A judgment by the Provincial Court of Logroño (Spain) in the matter of AIG Europe, S.A. v. Mecanizaciones Aeronáuticas, S.A., decided that when facing a pathological arbitration clause, the judges must presume that the parties’ intention was to actually resort to arbitration and, thus, enforce such clause. A similar rationale can be found in the decision rendered by the Provincial Court of Madrid, in the matter of Maintenance Development, S.A. v. Vector Software Factory, S.L.

In the U.S., following the enactment of the Federal Arbitration Act, in Moses H. Cone Mem’l Hosp. v. Mercury Constr. Corp., the Supreme Court ruled that, as a matter of federal policy, any doubt created by the drafting of the arbitration agreement should be resolved in favor of arbitration. This precedent, with a clear pro-arbitration approach, has guided case law for the following decades.

All these precedents attest to the existence of a principle of international law known as favor arbitralis, whereby, whenever possible, the courts should try to preserve or uphold the parties’ agreement to submit to arbitration.

A practical solution

However, the aid of State courts may not be sufficiently timed, and, in any event, it should not be taken for granted.

Any objection regarding the enforceability of a pathological arbitration clause will give rise to judicial proceedings which will entail extended timeframes and increased costs, thus postponing the moment when the arbitral tribunal will begin reviewing the merits of the parties’ dispute.

Furthermore, even in “pro-arbitration” jurisdictions, the State court will always be subject to limitations in construing arbitration clauses since it will be barred from redrafting or amending their wording. Hence, if the State court is not presented with sufficient evidence that the parties truly intended to submit their differences to arbitration, it will have no choice but to deny validity to the pathological arbitration agreement.

What is the practical solution to this problem?

Experience demonstrates that when drafting an arbitration clause, the best option will always be the easiest: to use the model arbitration clauses made available to public by renowned arbitration institutions.

These model clauses have been carefully drafted by experts, considering the best practices and principles of modern arbitration, and using a simple, but clear, language, which rules out any possibility of ambiguities or misinterpretations.

That is why model arbitration clauses provide a solid foundation for fair and efficient dispute resolution, avoiding the uncertainties and complexities associated to poorly worded clauses, guaranteeing a smooth arbitration and more satisfactory results, which is precisely what the parties have –surely– sought when stipulating an arbitration agreement.

The Asset Tracing and Recovery System in Chile: A Modernisation Challenge

In Chile, the legal regulation regarding the recovery of assets in national and international fraud is deficient. At present, there is no comprehensive legislation dealing specifically with this topic. However, victims of fraud may use the general tools that are available according to Chilean law for victims of crime that seek restoration. As in most countries around the world, Chilean legislation allows both civil and criminal remedies to achieve the recovery of assets.

Restoration of Assets

In the case of objects that were taken from a victim through fraud and then seized during the criminal investigation, it is possible to request the restoration of these assets through a simple application to the court. However, this simple restoration action can be problematic in cases where it is not possible to establish that the asset clearly belongs to the victim or where the asset has been transformed by the fraudster into another asset. This could also be problematic in cases of multiple victims, as there are no rules for criminal courts as to the order and proportion in which victims should be compensated.

Civil Action for Damages

The other possibility to obtain restoration within criminal proceedings is by filing a civil action against the defendant for damages (tort liability). Civil actions seeking compensation for the civil damages of criminal conduct can be filed in the same criminal proceeding or before the competent civil court. Thus, it is possible to have parallel criminal and civil proceedings. Nevertheless, once an action has been exercised before the criminal court, this precludes the right to do so in a civil court. On the other hand, if the action is brought by a third party, or directed against a person other than the accused, it must be brought before the competent civil court.

Despite the above, it is necessary to point out that civil liability is independent of criminal liability. Therefore, once the right to bring a civil action is extinguished, the right to file a criminal action persists. In the same sense, the circumstance of issuing an acquittal in a criminal matter does not automatically prevent the civil action from arising, if legally appropriate. On the other hand, criminal convictions produce res judicata in civil courts, and the plaintiff cannot adduce evidence or allegations that are incompatible with the decision in a criminal sentence or with the decisive considerations of that judgment.

Protecting the Economic Interests of the Victim

To prevent a defendant from dissipating assets or secreting them to avoid the consequences of a judgment, Chilean legislation provides a variety of precautionary measures to protect the economic interests of the victim, both in criminal and civil proceedings. Precautionary measures extend to any act that ensures or protects the claim deduced or the favourable sentence that could be pronounced. There are four measures particularly regulated: the sequestration of the good that is the subject of the lawsuit; the appointment of one or more auditors; the retention of certain goods; and the freezing of assets.

All these measures may be requested to a judge at any stage of the civil trial, even before the complaint is filed. In criminal proceedings, it is only possible to request these measures once the prosecutor has pressed formal charges against the defendant, which can be too late. In these cases, it's also possible that the public prosecutor seizes assets with a judge's order, and these objects may be subject to the penalty of confiscation in the final ruling.

International Fraud

In this regard, international fraud cases are particularly complex. Because of the principle of territoriality, to enforce a precautionary measure on assets located in Chile of a person who committed a crime abroad, either the foreign judgment must be enforceable, or the Chilean court must have jurisdiction over the matter. Therefore, in most cases it's not possible to establish precautionary measures in assets that are in Chile to ensure the outcome of a trial abroad.

Special Rules

Along with this general framework, there have been new developments that have introduced special rules that slightly alter the Chilean overall panorama.

For example, in respect to fraud in the banking field, Law No. 19,913, in force since 2003, regulates the Chilean anti-money laundering prevention system with the purpose of preventing the laundering of assets derived from unlawful acts, avoiding the use of the financial system and other actors of the financial system for money laundering. For this purpose, Law No. 19,913 created the Financial Analysis Unit (UAF), entity that has the power to request, verify, examine, and record information on suspicious activities, and request all the files that appear relevant in the context of the report of a suspicious transaction. In addition, it can exchange information with similar agencies abroad, and access the databases of public agencies if more information is required to complete the analysis of a suspicious transaction.

Another major legislative modification took place in 2014, through Law No. 20,720, that amended Chilean insolvency law improving the statute applicable to insolvency offences. This law also regulates cross-border insolvency, based on the UNCITRAL Model Law, determining cooperation between Chilean courts and other agencies involved and the foreign states that intervene in cases of insolvency, to give greater protection to national or foreign creditors and the assets of the debtor.

In that sense, it establishes important proceedings to regulate the cross-border effects of insolvency. For instance, it states the way to request that a foreign proceeding be recognized in Chile, the way assets of the debtor located in Chile may be protected and the way a creditor or other person abroad that is interested in requesting the procedure or participating in one may do it, among other things.

Recently, Law No. 21,459 introduced new cybercrime-related offences and investigative measures to comply with the Budapest Convention of Cybercrime. The new law amends the Chilean Criminal Code, introducing eight new offenses, including attacks on the integrity of a computer system, handling stolen computer data and cyber fraud. As to asset recovery, this law contemplates special investigative measures, including wiretapping and the use of undercover agents. Furthermore, authorities must seize the instruments used to commit the offences and the effects derived therefrom, including any profit. If said seizure is not possible, a sum of money equivalent to their value may be confiscated. However, if the nature of the information resulting from the offence 'may not be sold to third parties', Law No. 24,459 authorizes the destruction of the instruments used to perform the punishable conduct and any effects derived therefrom.

Lastly, it's important to mention the Economic Crimes Bill, which is currently in the final phase of discussion in the Chilean Congress and regulates different economic crimes and introduces the confiscation of profits. The latter could imply the confiscation of everything obtained as a consequence of the crime and could even be imposed without there being a conviction against those responsible.

Conclusion

In conclusion, although Chile has no comprehensive legislation dealing specifically with the recovery of assets, strivings have been made towards that purpose. However, these efforts have not been enough, especially regarding crimes with international implications. Chilean legislation and institutions need to modernise to effectively investigate and prosecute a thriving range of crimes that are most often executed from one jurisdiction, but have effects on another, and where assets must be recovered in a multiplicity of jurisdictions.

CHILE: An Introduction to Chile

Contributed by FerradaNehme

Constitutional Reform

As a result of the citizens' rejection of the text of the new Constitution proposed by the "Constitutional Convention", a new constituent process was initiated at the end of 2022 with the signing of an agreement between most of the political parties with parliamentary representation.

This agreement provided for the drafting of a new proposal for a constitutional text by 24 experts (appointed in March 2023 by the National Congress on the basis of parliamentary representation quotas) and by a "Constitutional Council" composed of 50 people democratically elected through a mandatory plebiscite held on 7 May 2023.

In general terms, the experts drafted a preliminary text, which had as a mandatory framework a set of 12 previously defined institutional bases, including the recognition in the text:

- that Chile is a democratic republic;
- that it is organised as a social state under the rule of law; that it is a unitary and decentralised state;
- that the state protects and guarantees the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals – such as the right to property, the right to life and equality before the law;
- that it recognises Indigenous peoples as part of the Chilean nation;
- that the state is organised into three separate and independent powers (executive, legislative and judicial);
- that it has certain autonomous bodies such as the Central Bank, the Public Prosecutor's Office and the Office of the Comptroller General of the Republic;
- that the state guarantees the care and conservation of nature and its biodiversity at the constitutional level; and
- that the state recognises that sovereignty is limited by human dignity and human rights recognised in international treaties.

The preliminary draft is being thoroughly reviewed by the councillors, who have four months to assess the proposal, which will include modifications and will incorporate new norms.

Finally, the text of the proposed new Constitution approved by the Constitutional Council must be ratified by the citizens through a mandatory plebiscite, to be held on 17 December 2023.

Currently, and given the progress of the actual constitutional process, it seems reasonable to expect a minimalist text, with an institutional and procedural approach, thus leaving the specific rules that may compromise the regulated industries to subsequent legal regulation.

New Developments in Public Law for Regulated Activities

In the following, we highlight certain statements made by agencies that have resolved legal conflicts of interest in the administrative and regulatory sphere, developing legal criteria relevant to regulated activities.

Pension and healthcare costs

Considering the Supreme Court's ruling that annulled the increase in the prices of the annual base plans of the Pension Health Institutions, better known as "Isapres", as the adoption of a general increase for affiliates was considered arbitrary, the Superintendence of Health published the Health Cost Indicator. This indicator set a maximum percentage of 2.6% as the threshold for Isapres to adjust their health plans, and they had to inform the authority of their decision and adjust to match the average operating cost of the institution during the previous year.

Further, the Supreme Court ordered the Superintendence of Health to elaborate on a single table of factors for Isapres and to reinstate certain extra charges to affiliates – which has had a relevant impact on the market – and which provoked a request for clarification from the Isapres, generating different interpretations about the effects of the ruling. For these reasons, legislative and regulatory modifications are expected in this sector.

Renewable energy and environmental assessments

In relation to the development of renewable energy projects, the Environmental Assessment Service published an environmental assessment criteria guide, which addresses the background information that project holders must present in the description of their green hydrogen production and storage proposals when submitting these for environmental assessment, taking into consideration the current public policies promoted by the Ministry of Energy. This guide presents, in detail, the key processes that make up the green hydrogen value chain.

Likewise, the Environmental Assessment Service has recently published a guide for the description of projects for desalination plants under its environmental impact assessment system, with the aim of unifying the criteria, background and requirements applicable to these projects.

Employment (contrata)

Regarding the employment regime of civil servants, the Supreme Court has indicated that the principle of legitimate expectations, which ensures the stability of the state's decisions vis-à-vis private parties, can be invoked after five years of "contrata" work (a mixed employment regime common in the Chilean administration that subjects civil servants to most of the regulations of the Labour Code). Therefore, the decision to terminate it early, or not to renew it, with respect to persons linked to the administration for more than that certain period of time, would go against the principle described above, which protects the legitimate expectation of finishing the period of an appointment and being rehired.

In this context, the statutory relationship of workers who are protected by the principle of legitimate expectations can only be terminated through the system of qualifications or a disciplinary procedure, and the mere fact that the period of appointment of the contrata has expired cannot be invoked.

Notwithstanding the aforementioned majority position adopted by the Supreme Court, the principle of legitimate expectations has also been invoked and recognised in case law after a period of less than five years of contrata work, which has opened an interesting debate on the construction of the standard for invoking this principle.

Tax reform

Finally, it is important to note that the government presented a tax reform bill, rejected in Congress in March 2023, which has generated a series of conversations between different industry and government actors with the aim of evaluating regulatory modifications in this area, which would garner the support of Congress.

For its part, the executive branch has evaluated alternatives to obtain the necessary financing to carry out various public policies that are part of the government's programme, through mining royalty initiatives and taxes on large capital among other revenue-raising schemes that may have an impact on regulated activities.

In particular, one of the initiatives that has been promoted in this regard is an increase in green taxes, a mechanism through which emissions of particulate matter, carbon dioxide and other compounds into the atmosphere from certain establishments are taxed, thus influencing the financial decisions to be made by project owners and the compensation and emission reduction measures that they must incorporate into their operations.

CHILE: An Introduction to Real Estate

Contributed by Marinovic & Alcalde Abogados

The real estate market in Chile has not been immune to the effects caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, which continue to impact the majority of markets worldwide. One of its main detrimental consequences has been a sharp increase in inflation in many countries, and Chile is no exception. This surge has significantly impacted the Chilean real estate market, as the Central Bank has attempted to curb the rise through an increase in interest rates, which has been detrimental to both real estate developers and end consumers, who nostalgically remember the financing conditions that existed in Chile before the pandemic.

However, thanks to the steadfastness of the Central Bank's monetary policy, there has been a slight improvement in the general conditions of the Chilean market in recent months, which could potentially lead to a future decrease in interest rates. This development has provided a breath of fresh air for companies dedicated to the real estate sector, as they perceive it as a sign that the market is heading in an upward direction, albeit they do so with the caution learned during the pandemic.

Thus, in recent months, the real estate market has shown signs of recovery, closely aligned with the government's decisions to seek ways to reactivate this sector, understanding its significance as one of the primary drivers of the Chilean economy.

Real Estate Companies

Despite the recent recovery experienced in the real estate sector, several construction and real estate companies were heavily impacted by adverse economic conditions, resulting in significant increases in construction costs and drastic reductions in profit margins for projects. Additionally, the mentioned tighter financing restrictions further exacerbated the challenges. Throughout 2022 and early 2023, some companies in the industry had to seek reorganisation or, in the worst cases, face liquidation due to insolvency situations. Surprisingly, even long-standing, industry-leading companies struggled to overcome these economic challenges.

As a consequence, companies related to the real estate world have become more cautious in designing their growth projections, aiming for greater liquidity and reduced structural debt. From a positive perspective, this shift should result in "healthier" companies, better prepared to face market stresses and uncertainties.

The Beneficiaries and New Trends

Nonetheless, some real estate developers also found good opportunities. One such case was the development of warehouse and/or logistics centres. The explosive and rapid growth of e-commerce led companies to seek strategic locations in which to store their products in order to meet the agile demands of online shopping. As a result, the warehouse market experienced a decline in vacancy rates, being lower than 1%. Naturally, this led to an increase in the prices of these properties, and many companies decided to invest in the development of such projects. It is expected that by early 2024, the warehouse and logistics centre market will grow by 250,000 square meters. This surge in supply and demand is likely to have significant effects on prices and has generated high expectations within the sector.

Another real estate product that benefited during the pandemic was multi-family buildings, due to the difficulty consumers faced in accessing credit for home purchases. This led many people to opt for renting instead of buying. The number of multi-family projects in Chile has increased approximately 25% since 2021, and it is expected to reach a 50% increase by the end of 2023, compared to the same date. This trend has allowed real estate companies to continue developing projects, despite the decrease in final buyers. Additionally, other companies whose core business was not real estate development have joined in, recognising the potential of their land to generate returns through multi-family real estate projects developed in partnership with investment funds and real estate developers.

On the other hand, the significant shift in working patterns caused by the pandemic, with companies adopting permanent or hybrid home office policies, has given rise to a new trend: the reversion of office buildings into residential or mixed-use projects.

Normative Context

Despite certain segments of the real estate market benefiting, the entire industry has had to contend with delays caused by public entities struggling to meet delivery deadlines. These difficulties are a consequence of the implementation of new regulations that have come into effect in recent years. Some of these regulations include the Public Space Contributions Law, the Ducts Law, the Urban Wetlands Law, and the New Real Estate Co-ownership Law. Additionally, there have been tax changes affecting companies in the real estate industry, such as the gradual loss of the Special Credit for Construction Companies.

This has been one of the main challenges for real estate development in recent years, prompting companies in the sector to establish technical-legal teams to adapt to the normative context and continue with their projects within the established timelines.

Both the government and the legislative power have attempted to improve this situation through different strategies. These include delaying the entry into force of some norms, implementing greater regulation gradually, and enacting regulations that exempt certain real estate projects from certain procedures, especially those where the State subsidises part of the housing acquisition price. The aim is also to provide developers with greater certainty to avoid delays in procedures that could lead to interpretative issues with the norms. Some of these measures have already been effective, while others are still being discussed, aiming to effectively boost the real estate market in Chile.

The Challenge

The challenge for all stakeholders in the real estate industry is to evaluate projects with constant monitoring of the normative context. Currently, real estate development demands that all professionals involved stay updated on regulations, requirements, and new trends. Additionally, companies must have the proper support of competent legal teams. Much of the success of a real estate project's development and execution in the Chilean market depends on this. The ability to adapt swiftly and efficiently to the normative context is essential to maintaining a solid and growing industry.
